

The Common Crow shown in this picture lives over most of the United States and Canada. They often form large flocks of several thousand birds.

Crows feed on grains, weed seeds, and berries. They also eat a good many insects and some dead animals. As forests were cut down and new farms were started, Crows found more food and have increased in number. The Crow's nest is usually built in a tree—most often in pines. The nest is well made of sticks and twigs and is lined with rootlets. Three to five greenish or bluish eggs are laid. Crows make interesting pets.
